TRAFFIC DEATH REDUCTION TREND CONTINUES INTO 1961

Richmond, Va. Virginia's steady and substantial reduction of annual traffic deaths since 1957 continued through the first two months of 1961, Colonel C. W. Woodson, Jr. reported today.

Colonel Woodson, Chairman of the Governor's Highway Safety Committee and Superintendent of State Police, set the toll for the past January and February at 91 to compare favorably with the 101 for the same period of 1960. Here, however, he noted that some changes in the totals may possibly be expected due to late reports or deaths of persons now carried as injured. The latter deaths revert to the date of injury for statistical purposes.

Virginia's highway deaths dropped from 912 in 1957 to 861 in 1958, to 850 in 1959 and to 756 in 1960. Traffic volumes, Colonel Woodson noted, are now about 6.7 percent above those of 1957.

Pedestrian deaths paralleled the overall reduction with a drop of from 21 to 18 for the period.

"It is still too early to draw any concrete conclusions from this favorable trend," Colonel Woodson said, "but if we can keep it alive, we will have one of the best records in the country when 1961 comes to an end. Our 1960 rate of 4.5 deaths per 100 million miles of travel was well below the national average of 5.3 last year."

In concluding, he asked the public not to look upon the situation simply as a statistical reduction but as human lives saved. "Any of those lives saved could have been yours or that of someone dear to you," he commented.
